www.publichealth.org

PublicHealth.org addresses the question, “What is public health?” by giving you the tools to research careers and degree programs so you can make a difference in this growing sector of the healthcare industry.

Their web site states “The public health sector is in dire need of highly-qualified specialists. The Association of Schools of Public Health (ASPH) predicts a shortage of 250,000 professionals (one-third of the existing public health workforce) by 2020. By these estimates, schools of public health will need to train three times the number of current enrollees to meet this need. Check out our degree guides to see how public health education can launch or focus your career.”

A guide for each state is provided. The types of accreditation for the programs is discussed to help students make an informed decision of how to pursue their training and what type of Health Care Programs of study are available in each state. Information on financial aid, internships, fellowships and practicums is also provided.
